Marie-Felix Ouentouen

To foster the idea of colonization, the state offered dowries to French-Amerindian marriages. In 1662, for example, Laurent Duboc received 500 livres for having married an indigenous woman in Nouveau France. Although the dominant colonial goal was to unify the French and Indian peoples, this was not to be achieved by dissolving boundaries separating the two cultures; on the contrary, a strict boundary was necessary to protect the French culture and prevent them from absorbing Indian ways. Thus the French were not permitted to marry natives which were still barbarians and only those who were civilized - meaning Christianized and Frenchified. The King wanted a purely French culture in Québec but due to a lack of marriageable women many habitants were becoming coeur des bois (Woods-runners), taking native wives, and siring the first true Canadian children and living marginalized wives outside of the French community.

Joachim Arontio Ouentouen (b.c.1620) was the first 'Huron chief' converted by Brébeuf. His wife was Cécile Arenhatsi (Huron). Cécile and Marie-Felix made it to the Jesuits after the Iroquois massacre and are mentioned in the Jesuit Relations but Ouentouen is not so easy to track. Their daughter, Marie-Felix Ouentouen (christened in 1640 in Québec City, Québec), married Laurent Duboc on 19 September 1662.

Marie-Felix Duboc was a businesswoman involved in the Fur Trade until she died on 1 November 1689 at Montréal, Québec
